. Circa 1915, modern medicine planted the seeds of today's health care dilemma – pushing for fewer doctors, less democracy of health care, and research funded by the government and drug companies.

. World War II and the advent of petrochemicals provided the key for the large-scale research, synthesis and production of modern drugs. Their promise was so great at first that they were adopted wholesale.

. American Herbalism has the opportunity to return democracy of health care to the country, and relieve the burden on the entire care system.
